London

A.D. 1665

A blazing star appeared for several weeks before the plague, passing directly over the city and so very near the houses it was plain it imported something peculiar and the apprehensions of the people were greatly increased.

-Journal of the Plague Year

The comet blazed across the heavens, trailing sparkling gas clouds and creating a spectacular show in the early evening sky. The clear weather brought people out into the gardens and lanes, enjoying the soft air and twinkling stars. Children clapped and laughed in wonder, but older denizens cast worried glances at the fiery arrow scorching the London sky. Such sights foretold disastrous events and, though they exclaimed, they soon began to voice fear and consternation. No good would come of it.

Rumor had it that the plague had arisen again in Venice, brought there from the Levant in the late autumn of last year. That graceful floating city was awash with bloated corpses that rose and sank with the tides, its vast wharves a graveyard of ships that entombed putrefying bodies. The great Doge himself was said to have fled the town with all his family. Thick smoke from sulfur fires lit to cleanse the air filled the streets. Infected citizens were locked away in their own houses, and heavy chains drawn across the waterways bore wooden placards warning of death.

These containment measures were doomed to fail; soon tales of roving, murderous bands of- refugees? penitents? began to filter into outlying lands as towns set up special watches and homegrown militias to guard against their advance. The bands only increased in size after each purported attack and the tales grew more fantastic with the passing months. The refugees were insurrectionists, the refugees were mad, the refugees were cannibals and no one could stop them.

Ghost ships, manned by nothing living, drifted on the high seas and foundered in harbors, spilling their dead into the briny waters. The plague leapt from Genoa to Marseilles to Le Havre.

Here it paused for a while, picking off victims almost casually, starting as usual at the waterfront then moving into the interior of the ancient Norman city. It lost none of its virulence, indeed its strength grew. Victims died even more quickly, in even more agony. Vessels bound for many ports departed in haste, fleeing the ravaged town. The spread continued.

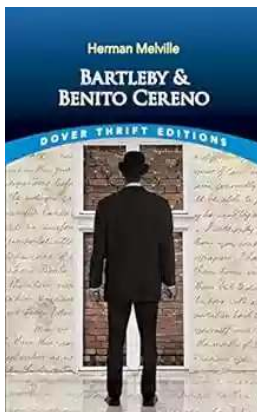

The Bonnie Lass, a 200 ton, many-voyaged, merchant vessel, returned to London from the ports of Istanbul carrying more than just dates from Damascus and spices from fabled India. One of their crew, a carpenter's assistant from Hever, was injured by an unusually belligerent local in an unimportant, slightly drunken scuffle outside a tavern near the docks. His shipmates had to carry him aboard.

Unaware they had loaded Death onto their ship, the sailors happily anticipated spending their share of the voyage's earnings, never imagining they would be dead and pitched overboard to a cold, watery grave by the time they reached the storm-tossed English Channel.

Sailing up the Thames and anchoring at Gravesend, most were too weak to board the skiff their shipmates launched under cover of darkness and were left behind, drowning in their own blood and phlegm. Many would rise to a different existence, unlike any they could have imagined.

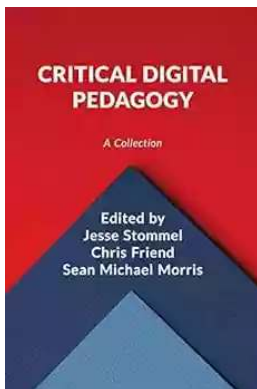

Those who escaped the ship before port officials could board and quarantine them all, carried Death and more to their unsuspecting families.

Along the docks of Southwark and through Cheapside the plague slithered from taverns to boarding houses to chapels and took its first victims before anyone knew it was among them. London began to die.
