

The 2019 Motorcyclist Advocacy Manual - Your Ultimate Guide to Motorcycle Safety and Rights

What is Proactive Advocacy?

Every year, public officials make decisions about funding and priorities for afterschool and youth programs. The President sets, and Congress votes, on appropriations for major federal funding streams including 21st Century Community Learning Centers and Child Care Development Fund. At the state level, regulations and administrative policies dictate how the money is distributed out to the community level for direct service grants.

Every afterschool organization or program that is funded by all or a portion of federal, state or local funding should invest in proactive advocacy. Proactive advocacy is relationship building. Afterschool organizations must build relationships with public officials, state agency staff, and other key policy makers in order to expand awareness about the importance of afterschool and the successful outcomes from each program.

Advocacy is a critical component of a sustainable, high-quality program. Proactive advocacy is the skill of looking ahead and preparing your organization or program for long-term success. Instead of waiting for an issue, such as a cut in funding, proactive advocacy involves outreach to key stakeholders and strategies to develop relationships and trust.

Proactive advocacy is the precursor to issue-based advocacy efforts. When an organization already has strong relationships with a state legislator who knows about the afterschool program and the children and families who benefit, they can more quickly be called on when an actual issue, such as legislation, potentially affects the afterschool field.

There is a general misconception that advocacy must be adversarial between state officials and community organizations. However, the most successful advocacy efforts are from those organizations that invest time and resources in long-term relationship-building. It takes time and patience to build trust and find commonality.

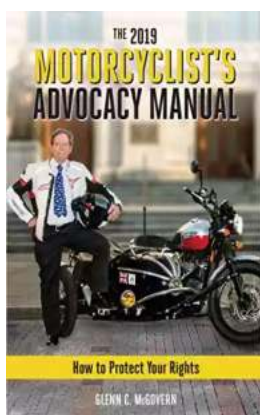

This Advocacy Toolkit provides a set of useful tools for designing and implementing effective advocacy strategies, including 5 Strategies for building in proactive advocacy activities into your organizational strategic plan, Resources for Using Data, and a Self-Assessment Tool to identify core strengths and opportunities.

My name is Glenn McGovern. I'm a motorcyclist, a motorcycle racer, and a certified Motorcycle Safety Foundation instructor in MSF basic motorcycles. Motorcycles have been a part of me for my entire life. I'm also an aggressive, dedicated motorcycle jury trial attorney. We represent and advocate for injured motorcyclists. There is one thing we won't do--- we do not represent big insurance companies. We fight for individual motorcyclists only. We also advocate and lobby legislatures for laws that protect motorcyclists.

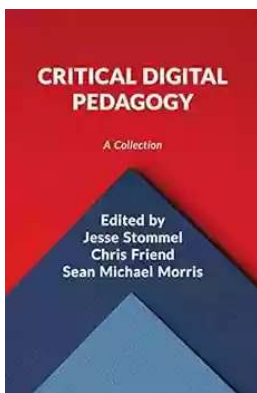

This book aims to give you a better idea of the current state of laws, rights, and issues pertaining to motorcyclists in Louisiana and throughout the United States. I tell you my personal stories, and how I have changed and learned as a result of riding and advocating for motorcyclists. I explain the largest gaps in motorcycle safety, and what you need to do to protect your rights.

My passion is to protect the rights of motorcyclists and their families. Right now, the laws do not protect us when we are on our motorcycles. This is wrong. The law is not on our side.
