Before the establishment of the German Confederation, each state issued its own banknotes. This decentralized monetary system resulted in a wide variety of currencies circulating within the German World, causing confusion and inefficiency in trade.

The Prussian Influence: Foundation of the Deutsche Reichsbank

In 1871, the German Empire was formed under the leadership of Prussia. The empire's unification brought about the need for a centralized monetary authority to stabilize the currency and promote economic growth. Consequently, the Deutsche Reichsbank was established as the central bank of the German Empire.

The Reichsbank introduced a standardized currency known as the Mark, which replaced the numerous old state currencies. The Mark became the official currency within the German World and gained recognition internationally.

Challenges and Transformations in the Early 20th Century

The early 20th century was a tumultuous period for Germany and its paper money. World War I and the subsequent defeat brought about severe economic repercussions, and hyperinflation became a significant issue during the Weimar Republic.

During this period, German banknotes underwent dramatic changes, both in terms of design and value. The iconic "hyperinflation banknotes" arose as the German government tried to cope with the economic crisis. These banknotes featured exorbitant denominations, such as one billion Marks, reflecting the staggering inflation rates at the time.

However, this period of hyperinflation and economic instability ultimately led to the introduction of a new currency. In 1924, the Rentenmark was introduced to stabilize the economy and regain trust in the German currency.
