

Your Siren Poems: The Enchanting Melodies of Tara Hill

He was Odysseus
And she a siren
So he tied himself back
While screaming her name
She begged him to come closer
Her voice,
Her tears hot coals on his heart
The ropes cut into his skin
As he pulled
The mast holding him back
Though he thrashed, it stood steadfast
She screamed for him
Her sobs echoing over the waves
And he hollered back, bellowing
Setting his throat aflame
Forwards the ship carried him
Away from her
But Gods he needed her
He wanted to wrap her in his arms, close to him
And kiss her, promising he'd never leave again
He needed her as she needed him
But soon, her begging faded on the wind
Her voice fading from his mind
She stayed there, clutching the rocks
Whispering for him
And again, damn it, again
He left her behind
